The evidence of need to support food security is clear. Before COVID-19, 11% of King County adults experienced food insecurity, and 26.5% of parents and caregivers with young children said it was hard to afford basics like food. During the 2008 recession, the number of people visiting King County food banks increased by over 72,000 people, a 30% increase compared to 2007; the number of people visiting food banks continued to increase through 2009 and 2010 before starting to trend downward in 2011, indicating that the increased need for food may extend over a prolonged recovery period. Food banks and meal programs serving vulnerable populations are experiencing a surge in demand that has created a strain on their capacity. Community agencies operating emergency food programs report a need for additional staff to distribute food; fresh produce and protein; drivers and vehicles to transport food; and more storage capacity.
